At the moment, 10,000,000 men in arms faced one another on that long line, thirsting to annihilate in blood yearning only to mangle and kill. But there had been a meeting of minds, and by that brief message from the Eiffel towns, all the fury that had been loosed in the world in remembrance of them, and of what they did, or tried was leashed, and men could about their hands without having them blows off. There remained but drudgery. The morning log in which one could not see a hundred yards had litted, and the irreging rain drireled as usual on men who had not been dry for mounts, and they felt aggrisred. Hen can stand war, but they have never been able to release small.

Without the shedding of blood there is no re-amption. At least, so say the fathers of the church. In the angle of the crossroads where three great roads meet, there is a quiet half ame, slightly elevated. Climb the wut slope and part the dripping bushes; enter. Seven crosses crudely fashioned; you may read the names. Our deed are there.
